

Sustainability is achievable through the decisions we make, every day, everywhere we shop.

Voiz trains Sustainability Analyst Interns to evaluate and rate the sustainability of products on behalf of consumers. They take in information about supply chains, packaging, labor treatment and water use, and then write fair-minded, incisive and relatable reviews. The experience is a combination of sustainability skills prep and advocacy. Collectively, the reviews form the independent voice of a new generation. It's a voice that guides consumers to brands that show progress. It also holds corporations accountable when they could do better. We believe in giving people more of a say in sustainability. Consumers should have the knowledge to choose — and to ask that more be done.

Over a hundred students from UCLA, USC, Cornell, UC Berkeley, McGill, Georgetown and other schools have participated in our program. Along the way, they have built a strong community of people who care passionately about the planet.

The Voiz Sustainability Analyst Internship has new cohorts starting in March and June of 2021. It includes both an eight-week Sustainability Evaluation course and experience in evaluating products and writing reviews. Our approach is interactive and hands-on. In class you'll explore how design choices like sourcing, materials, energy use and working conditions impact sustainability. You'll put the concepts to work immediately -- diving into reviews -- and share the results with your peers in wide-ranging review sessions. The topics discussed will include cultural appropriation, greenwashing, racial justice, the climate crisis, the SDG's, green technology and more. It's not "theory". Everyone is making decisions about what to tell consumers and companies. That's what makes it real.

In addition to its class and reviews track, Voiz also has a limited number of positions available on the venture side. These involve helping to move Voiz forward as a decentralized community. Students have built our social media presence, run podcasts, recruited partners, designed our website and demo video, and more. We believe in empowering students to learn and succeed by doing, and by not being afraid of risking failure. If you're interested in this "start-up track", please let us know in your cover letter.

Voiz is a social venture. We rely on students who are willing to volunteer their time to make an impact. We offer valuable training and experience, and we encourage you to seek course credit if appropriate for your institution. We also offer a vibrant community, one of people who are dedicated to making an impact. If interested, please reach out with your resume and cover letter to yvonne@voizreviews.com, or apply on our website at www.voizreviews.com/apply.
